street and Broadway, was put out of misseed by sensitive ears. The mounting of the second act, which takes place upon the Tower of the Maladati, is replete with war machines of thirteenth century contrivance, such as catapulat, fiery bombs and holling oil, in addition to bows and arrows, and, palpsibly, harmless round shot. The scene is far inferior in conception and in execution to the fight on the bridge in the moving picture of "Cabiria." The act might be dropped to the advantage of the opera, for the scene is unconvincing and the muster is unconvincing and the muster is commonplace. Gus Carlsea, Christie's bartender, who lives at No. 132 Third Place, told the police his employer had attended a bowling tournament last night and returned late to the saloon. Christie, he said, was a good man, and had made many friends by his kindness to the poor. He had no enemies, according to Carlsen.

Christie was fifty-two years old and lived with his wife and six children at No. 72 Fourth Place.
